Society and Snowflakes

I wonder why society is so strict. The standards are so high, making it so that if you mess up once then everything is ruined. I wish there was room for mistakes, especially in school. I try the best I possibly can and even more to get good grades, but sometimes its not enough. Doing bad on a test makes me feel discouraged and then I feel like studying is useless, since it obviously didn't help me the last time.

But then I just turn to God, who makes everything better. He opens my eyes to the world to see its beauties other than its downfalls. Although no one's perfect, beauty is everywhere. You just have to really look for it. And when you find it, everything is perfect.

I look out my window and see the snowflakes, falling towards the earth, and I wonder...

why can't life always be so perfect, so free to go wherever the wind leads you? Why can't it be like this forever?
